TOO MANY MANNERS

FLORRIE'S mother dried the last dish and gave it to Florrie to be put away in the closet.

"Well, Florrie," Mrs. Combe asked, putting away the dish towel, "don't you have a date with Ken tonight?"

"Yes, I do . . . why?"

"You don't seem very excited about it, is something wrong?" asked her mother.

"Oh, I don't know . . . I guess it's because every time we go out I realize more and more how impolite he is. Ken's no model of manners, you know."

Which were exactly the thoughts Mr. and Mrs. Combe had about their daughter's beau ever since they had first started dating. However, in other respects, he was a nice young boy, and they rather liked him, even with his poor manners.

Ken called for Florrie at eight sharp, and they left for the movies. They walked into the theater, and finding no usher, walked down the dark aisle, looking for seats.

"Gosh, it looks as if there are only singles left, Ken," Florrie sighed, turning to Ken, who had been walking behind her. "Ken . . . where are you . . . KEN?"

Someone shouted from the second row from the back. "HEY, FLORRIE . . . HERE I AM . . . I TOOK A SINGLE BACK HERE . . . I'LL MEET YOU AFTER THE SHOW!"

Florrie's heart dropped, and she was glad the theater was dark, so that no one could see her beet-red face. She sat down, alone, and tried to enjoy the picture. In an hour or so, she began to feel hungry again, and started back for the candy counter. When she had almost reached the rear of the theater, a hand grabbed hers.

"Hey, wher'are you going?" Florrie could hear Ken's questioning voice, and she tried to get his voice down to a whisper amid the annoyed "SH's" of the other people in the audience.

"Quiet . . . I'm going to get a candy bar at the counter, Ken." said Florrie.

"Hey . . . that's great . . . get me one, too . . . and here's a quarter for the candy."

Florrie looked at the quarter in her hand and was shocked. "Boy," she thought, "Isn't he getting thoughtful in his old age?"

She went to the candy counter, purchased the two bars of chocolate, and went back to her seat after giving one to Ken. Just as she sat down, the man next to her got up and walked out. A second later, Florrie heard strange noises coming from the aisle directly to the side of her seat.

"OUCH . . .

"OOOF . . . YOUNG MAN, I'm going to call the manager."

"Get off my feet, you clumsy oaf!"

When she looked up, Ken was sitting beside her in the recently vacated seat. "Wow . . . what a job I had crawling through here with all those big feet in the way."

"Oooooohh, you jerk!" Florrie growled, looking straight ahead, trying not to let anyone else know that she was acquainted with this character.

When the second feature came on, Ken shook Florrie's arm. "Hey, Florrie . . . this looks like one of the dopey drah-mas . . . let's go . . . I could use a soda."

And before Florrie could protest, she was being dragged from her seat, over the feet again, while all the time she was muttering excuses to the unfortunate people they were disturbing.

They walked out of the theater, and into the ice-cream shop next door. When they were seated at a booth, and had received their double chocolate sodas, Florrie felt a little relieved.

"SHLLLUURRPP!"

"KEN . . . you are the most . . . the most . . . uncouth . . . boy I've ever known. Can't you enjoy the soda without slurping it up?" Florrie screamed.

She hurried through her soda, and waited, eyes closed and ears covered, while Ken attempted to sip the remains of his soda, then got up and put on her own coat.

"Oh, gosh . . . Florrie . . . I gave you my last bit of change for the candy before in the movie . . . I just have enough for the sodas! How about leaving the kid a tip?"

Florrie withdrew a dime from her purse, placed it on the table, threw up her hands helplessly as the other customers laughed, and pulled Ken from the store.

After Ken took her home, she walked into her parents' bedroom and said goodnight to them. But before she left, she turned to her mother and said, "Mom . . . Ken is terribly impolite . . . and that's the understatement of the year. What can I do? I like him, he's lots of fun, but sometimes his manners embarrass me so."

Her mother had an idea. "Look, Florrie. How about asking him over for dinner tomorrow night? Maybe when he sees that you're anxious to have him behave well in front of your parents, he'll learn to act nicely. We can try, anyway."

And so Ken was invited to dinner. At six thirty the next evening, the bell rang. Not once, not twice, but four times.

"Can't you understand that we can hear the doorbell even when it rings once?" Florrie asked, exasperated, letting Ken in.

Mr. and Mrs. Combe and Ken and Florrie sat down to the dinner table. When Ken started to eye the soupspoon just as the grapefruit was put in front of him, Florrie coughed, and he understood. He quickly picked up the correct spoon.

When Mrs. Combe brought the roast to the table, Ken felt pretty proud of himself.

"May I carve for you, Mr. Combe?" he asked, overcome with helpfulness. Mr. Combe hesitated, but at his wife's glance, agreed to give Ken the task. Ken started on the roast. At first, he did well. But when he got to the third slice, the fork slid from the meat, and the roast landed on the table, splashing Mr. Combe's tie with gravy.

"Oh, gosh I'm sorry, Mr. Combe . . . here let me." Ken apologized. He took a glass of water in his hand, but in reaching for a napkin, the water spilled, ran down the table, and landed in Mrs. Combe's lap. She jumped up, and Florrie started mopping her mother's dress, all the while looking at anything but Ken's face.

When things were again quiet, and Mr. Combe had finished carving the roast successfully, dessert passed quite nicely. When Mrs. Combe announced that there would be milk and cake afterwards, indicating that dinner was over, Ken rushed from his seat, tore around the table, and helped Mrs. Combe from her chair. But as he held the chair back for her, her stocking caught, and ripped all the way down the front of the stocking. Mrs. Combe gritted her teeth, and tried to make casual talk so that she could cover up Mr. Combe's whispered threats of violence.

"Now Florrie and I will do the dishes," Ken announced gallantly.

"Er . . . I . . . no thank you, dear," Mrs. Combe smiled, "It's quite alright. I'll do them." She dragged her husband into the kitchen along with her.

Florrie smiled and took Ken's arm. "Ken, let's just go into the living room . . . we can put on some nice soft music."

"WHAT? SAY, I THOUGHT YOU WANTED ME TO BE POLITE? WHAT KIND OF MANNERS IS THAT . . . LEAVING YOUR FOLKS ALONE IN THE KITCHEN TO DO ALL THE WORK, WHILE WE SIT IN A DARK LIVING ROOM? Nothing doing."

"That's alright, Ken," Florrie smiled, trying not to blush at the sight of her mother and father winking at her from the kitchen, "Mom and dad will understand, I assure you. Besides, I've decided that it's less dangerous to leave you the way you are. Come on, Ken!"
